Lough Hyne is a small salt water lake in West Cork that is renowned for its beauty, tranquillity and unique natural history. People have lived and worked at the lough for at least 4000 years. This is the story of these people, and this special place, told through its archaeology, history, folklore and ecology. How this remote lake came to be designated as the first Marine Nature Reserve in Europe is part of the story that is specific to Lough Hyne. However, other parts of its history, including its rule by the O'Driscoll Lordship and its experiences during the Great Famine have much in common with other areas of West Cork. Its archaeology, too, tells us much about the prehistoric people who lived around the lough and how they lived and worshipped through the ages of stone, metal, early Christianity and the arrival of the Vikings.
